

MEMPHIS APPEAL—WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 5, 1863.

Daily Appeal.

ATLANTA, GA.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 5.

THE ATLANTA NEWS, PRESENTS.

The chief among the questions, both with the public and the army of the Southwest, at this time, is the way of information furnished the Brandon Republicans by a gentleman who left the city on the day named.

A large portion of the Federal army had left the place, some having gone up and others down. Grant and Sherman had both left, leaving McCook in command of the department.

The cars were running from this city to the Big Black and the Yazelles were breaching the roads, when they could run to Jackson and thence to Meridian.

In the city they had a large negro force at work, cleaning and repairing the streets. No orders are allowed to be sent except by their subordinates, and if a citizen wishes to keep any news from a writer, he gets an order from the commanding officer, who fixes the price.

This was done to prevent the newspaper from having a bridge across that stream in those days, when they could run to Jackson and thence to Meridian.

The Memphisians are less virulent than "us" of the Southern journals on this subject, and take quite a calm and unimpassioned view of the case, which, however, is none the less forcible on that account. "A sober, honest, sensible," says that paper, "for the people and the press of the Confederacy to keep up from the devoted hand of Gen. Pemberton. We are no longer those who believe in his fidelity, though he has always been sensible of our efforts to sustain the cause of the South, and to help it along."

Gen. Pemberton's policy of "Pounding" is now a mere泡影, and whatever may have been his original capacity as a general, he has lost his originality, and become a mere Southernist, and even a dissembler by the side of the more important in the Confederacy, the men that he could make. It was known, however, that this man of Mississippi, knowing the strategy of General Davis, the bold and skillful man in the administration, had the best men, the leading men in the administration, to sustain him in his efforts to sustain the army, and to sustain us to the end of our life.

We do not hesitate to say, that the others are to be pitied by the armament, that no general ever possessed so little confidence of either the army or the people as Gen. Pemberton. And to his simple, and may be amiable, the mistakes which he made in the country through his instrumentality, the whole world is to be pitied.

The President was anxious to send General Pemberton, and urged to send a man to whom all could trust. Yet Pemberton was retained, and his work has been accomplished.

We have said that we have divided the loyalty of General Pemberton, but the placing in his charge the key to the whole bounding valley of the Mississippi was potentially unfortunate—it was an act which has brought upon us all the wanton unmercifulness which were foisted. Had he been a straight-out traitor—he had been equally fit to decimate the country—and it would have been easily accomplished.

EP The Montgomery Advertiser states that at the arrival of Gen. Hurlbut, the officers had the choice of either going North or to New Orleans. The 1st Alabama, where the South is now, was sent westward. The 1st Mississippi, the most illiterate, and the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th,
